Roscoe Conkling: Senator of the United States, Washington Sir: If you were a man of less note; indeed if you did not possess capacity equal to Senatorial dignity, and were not sufficiently versed in statesmanship to know the teachings and the tendencies of history; and again, if it was not conceded that you were familiar with the Constitution, and its jurisprudence, I should not now address you. But, sir, this, as well as the fact that the destiny of the nation and the future of your own fame are at stake, prompt me to the exercise of my right as your constituent, and my judgment as your peer, to warn, to entreat and to advise you. That you may be at no loss to understand the object of my solicitude, I will state to you at once that I deny the oratorical assertion of the managers of Impeachment in presenting themselves to the Senate, that they came there to represent and as representatives of the People of the United States. The assertion, sir, is a monstrous lie, to bridge over a monstrous fraud. Those who made it knew it to be false as a fact, infamous as an assertion, and unworthy of belief even by the willing ears which listened to the loose eloquence of Bingham or heard the bottled thunder of Butler. For, however much you may gild a fraud, or paint a lie, the sober truth will rub away the varnish, for The eternal years of God are hers. It has been well said, that, to overthrow a State, the crime must be wrought in the name of the...
